Most citrus is only hardy to about 28 degrees.
This means that a winter frost will kill your precious bushes and trees. We suggest keeping your citrus plants in a pot so that it can be brought inside (or at least moved under a porch or overhang) in winter. Another option is to cover your plant completely with frost fabric or plastic before and during cold snaps. You could also try hanging big-bulbed Christmas lights (the kind that give off a little bit of heat) on it to prevent frost from damaging the plant.
